STAT

1. The draft version of an updated study of harassments and provocations has drawn very favorable comments from personnel on my staff.

2. I have two comments to offer. First, it would have great benefit for the industrial security world if the study could be edited in a version not requiring protection at standard levels of classification. The threat of technological espionage and targeting is currently a particularly serious industrial security problem for both contractors and their employees. A study of this nature would be of great value to get out into the industrial security world. Second, the "Summary and Conclusions" printed on page 18 of the July 1978 edition is worth repeating in any current iteration of the study.
